The search for an isolated, picture-postcard site has been successful for this pair of bronzed beauties. They lend each other support while preparing to sunbathe nude. Sandals and a dab of sunscreen are the only accompaniments necessary.

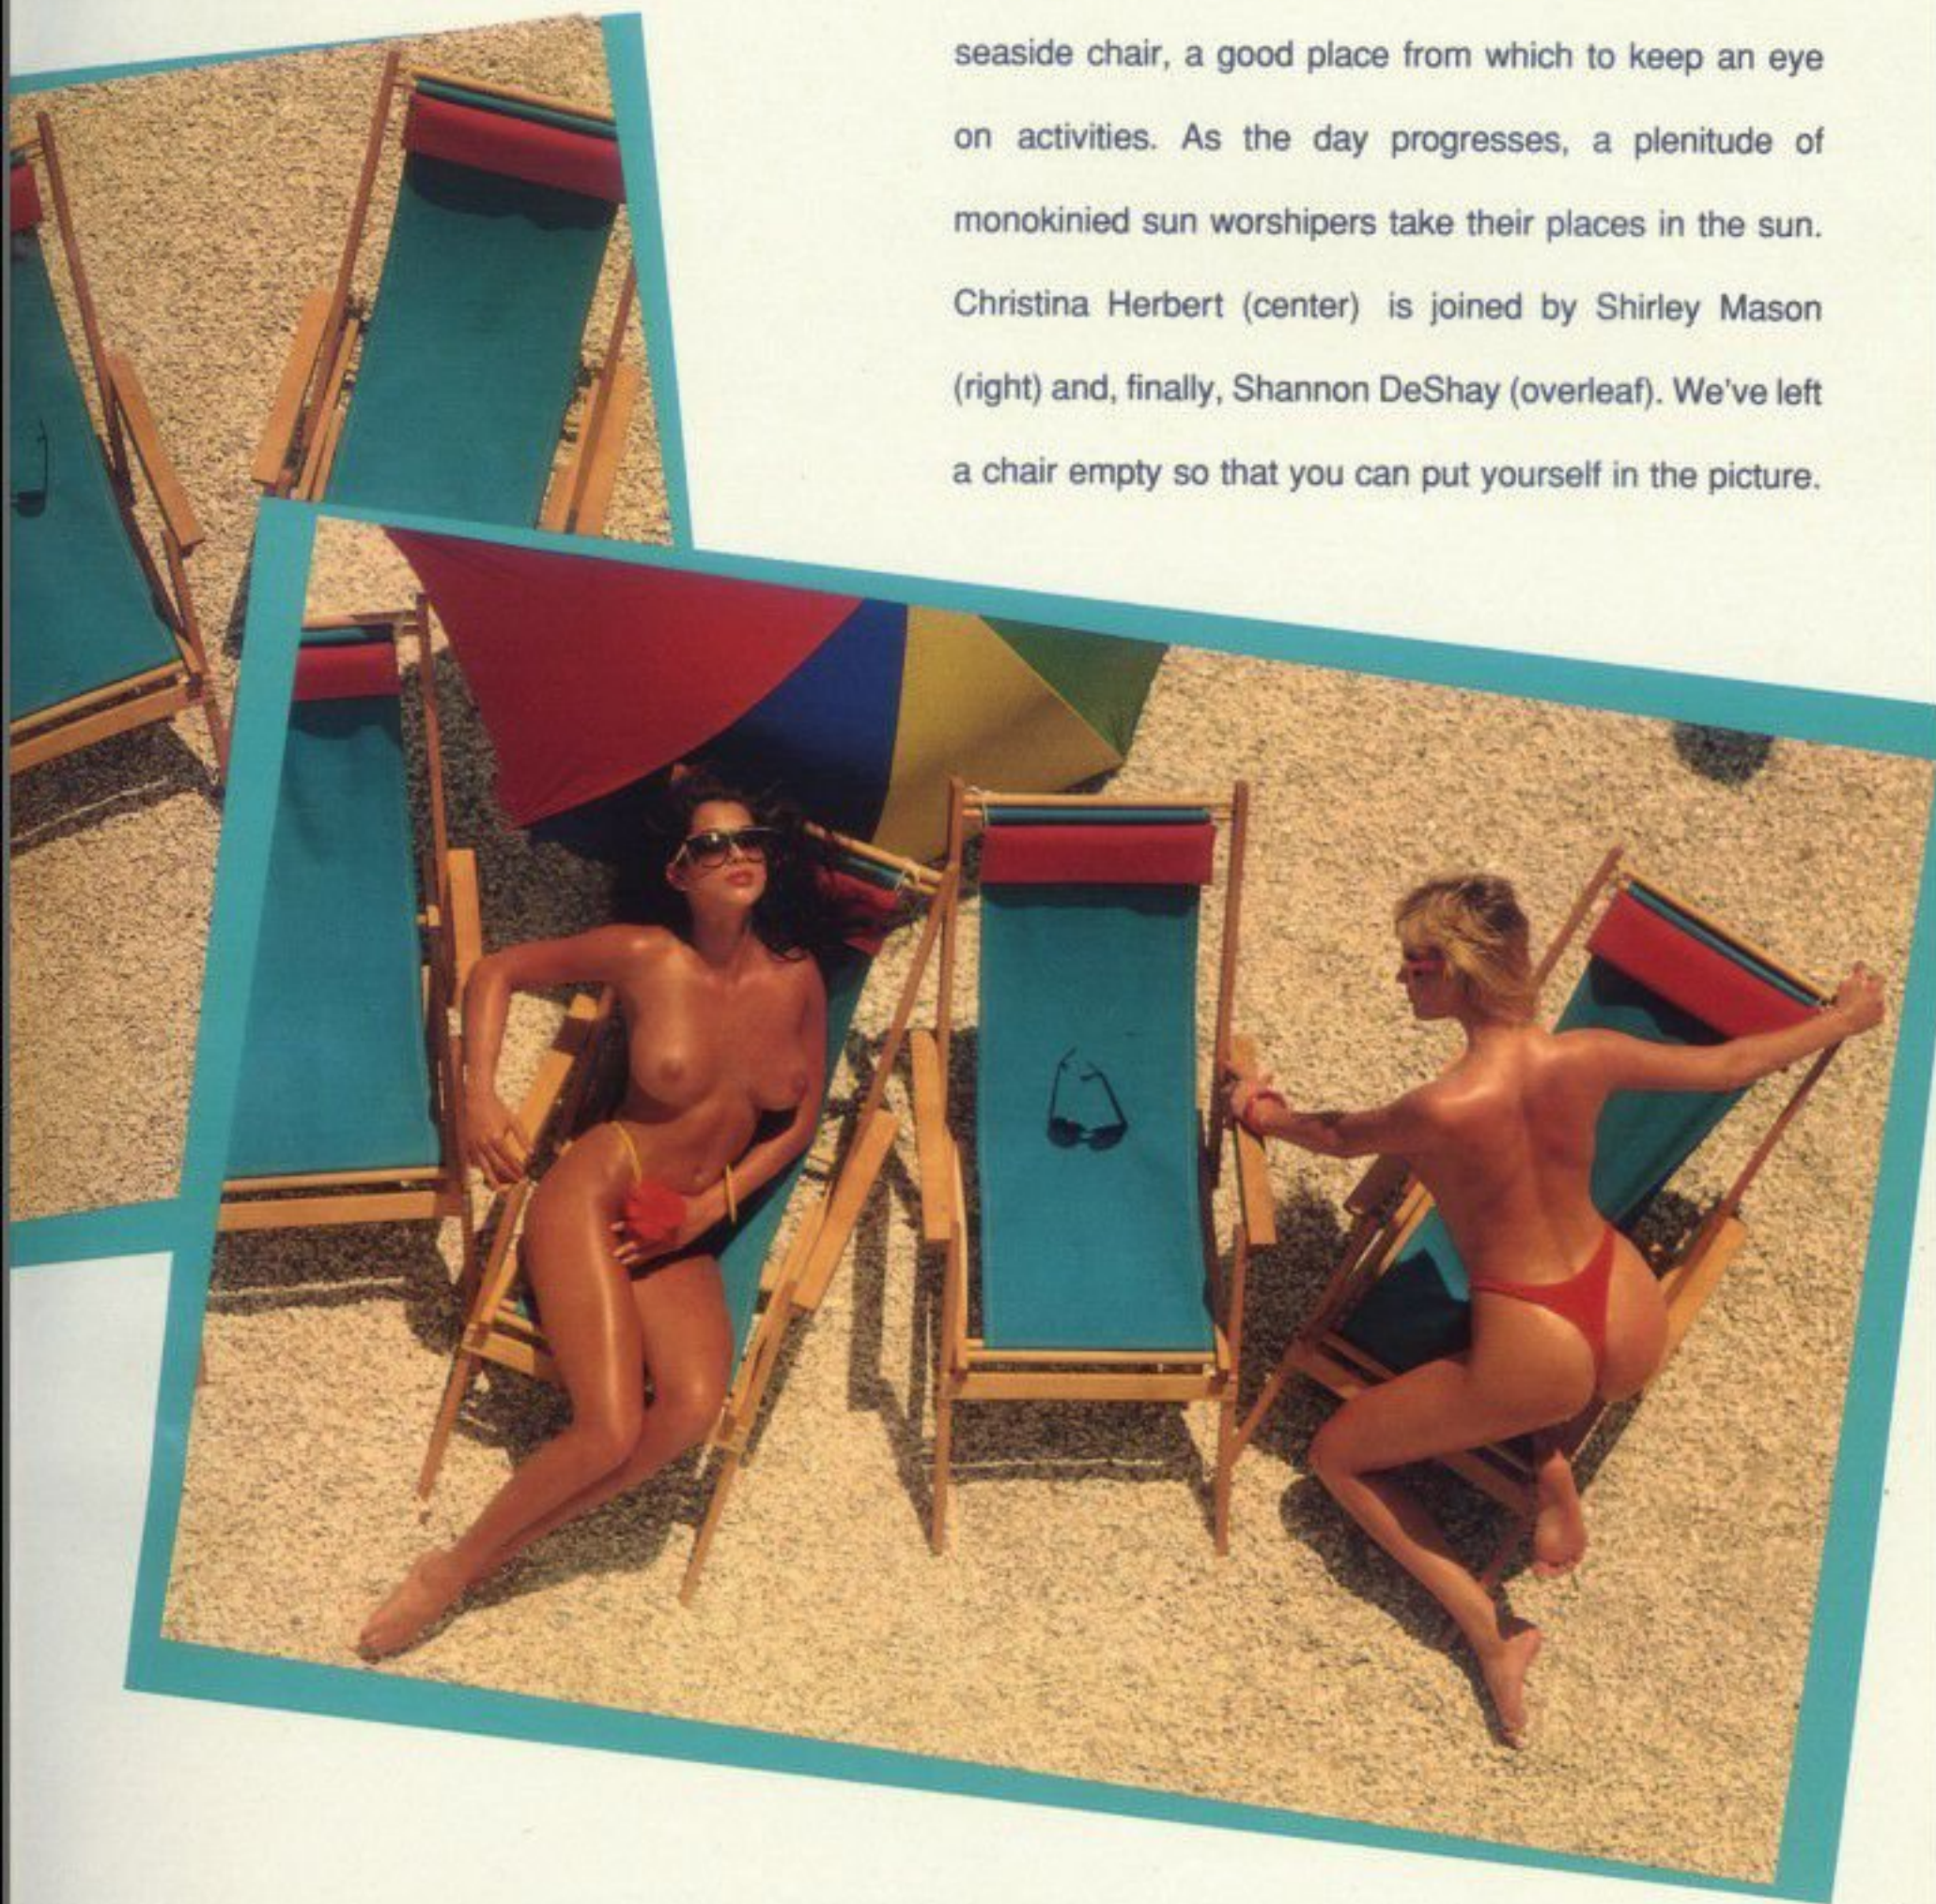

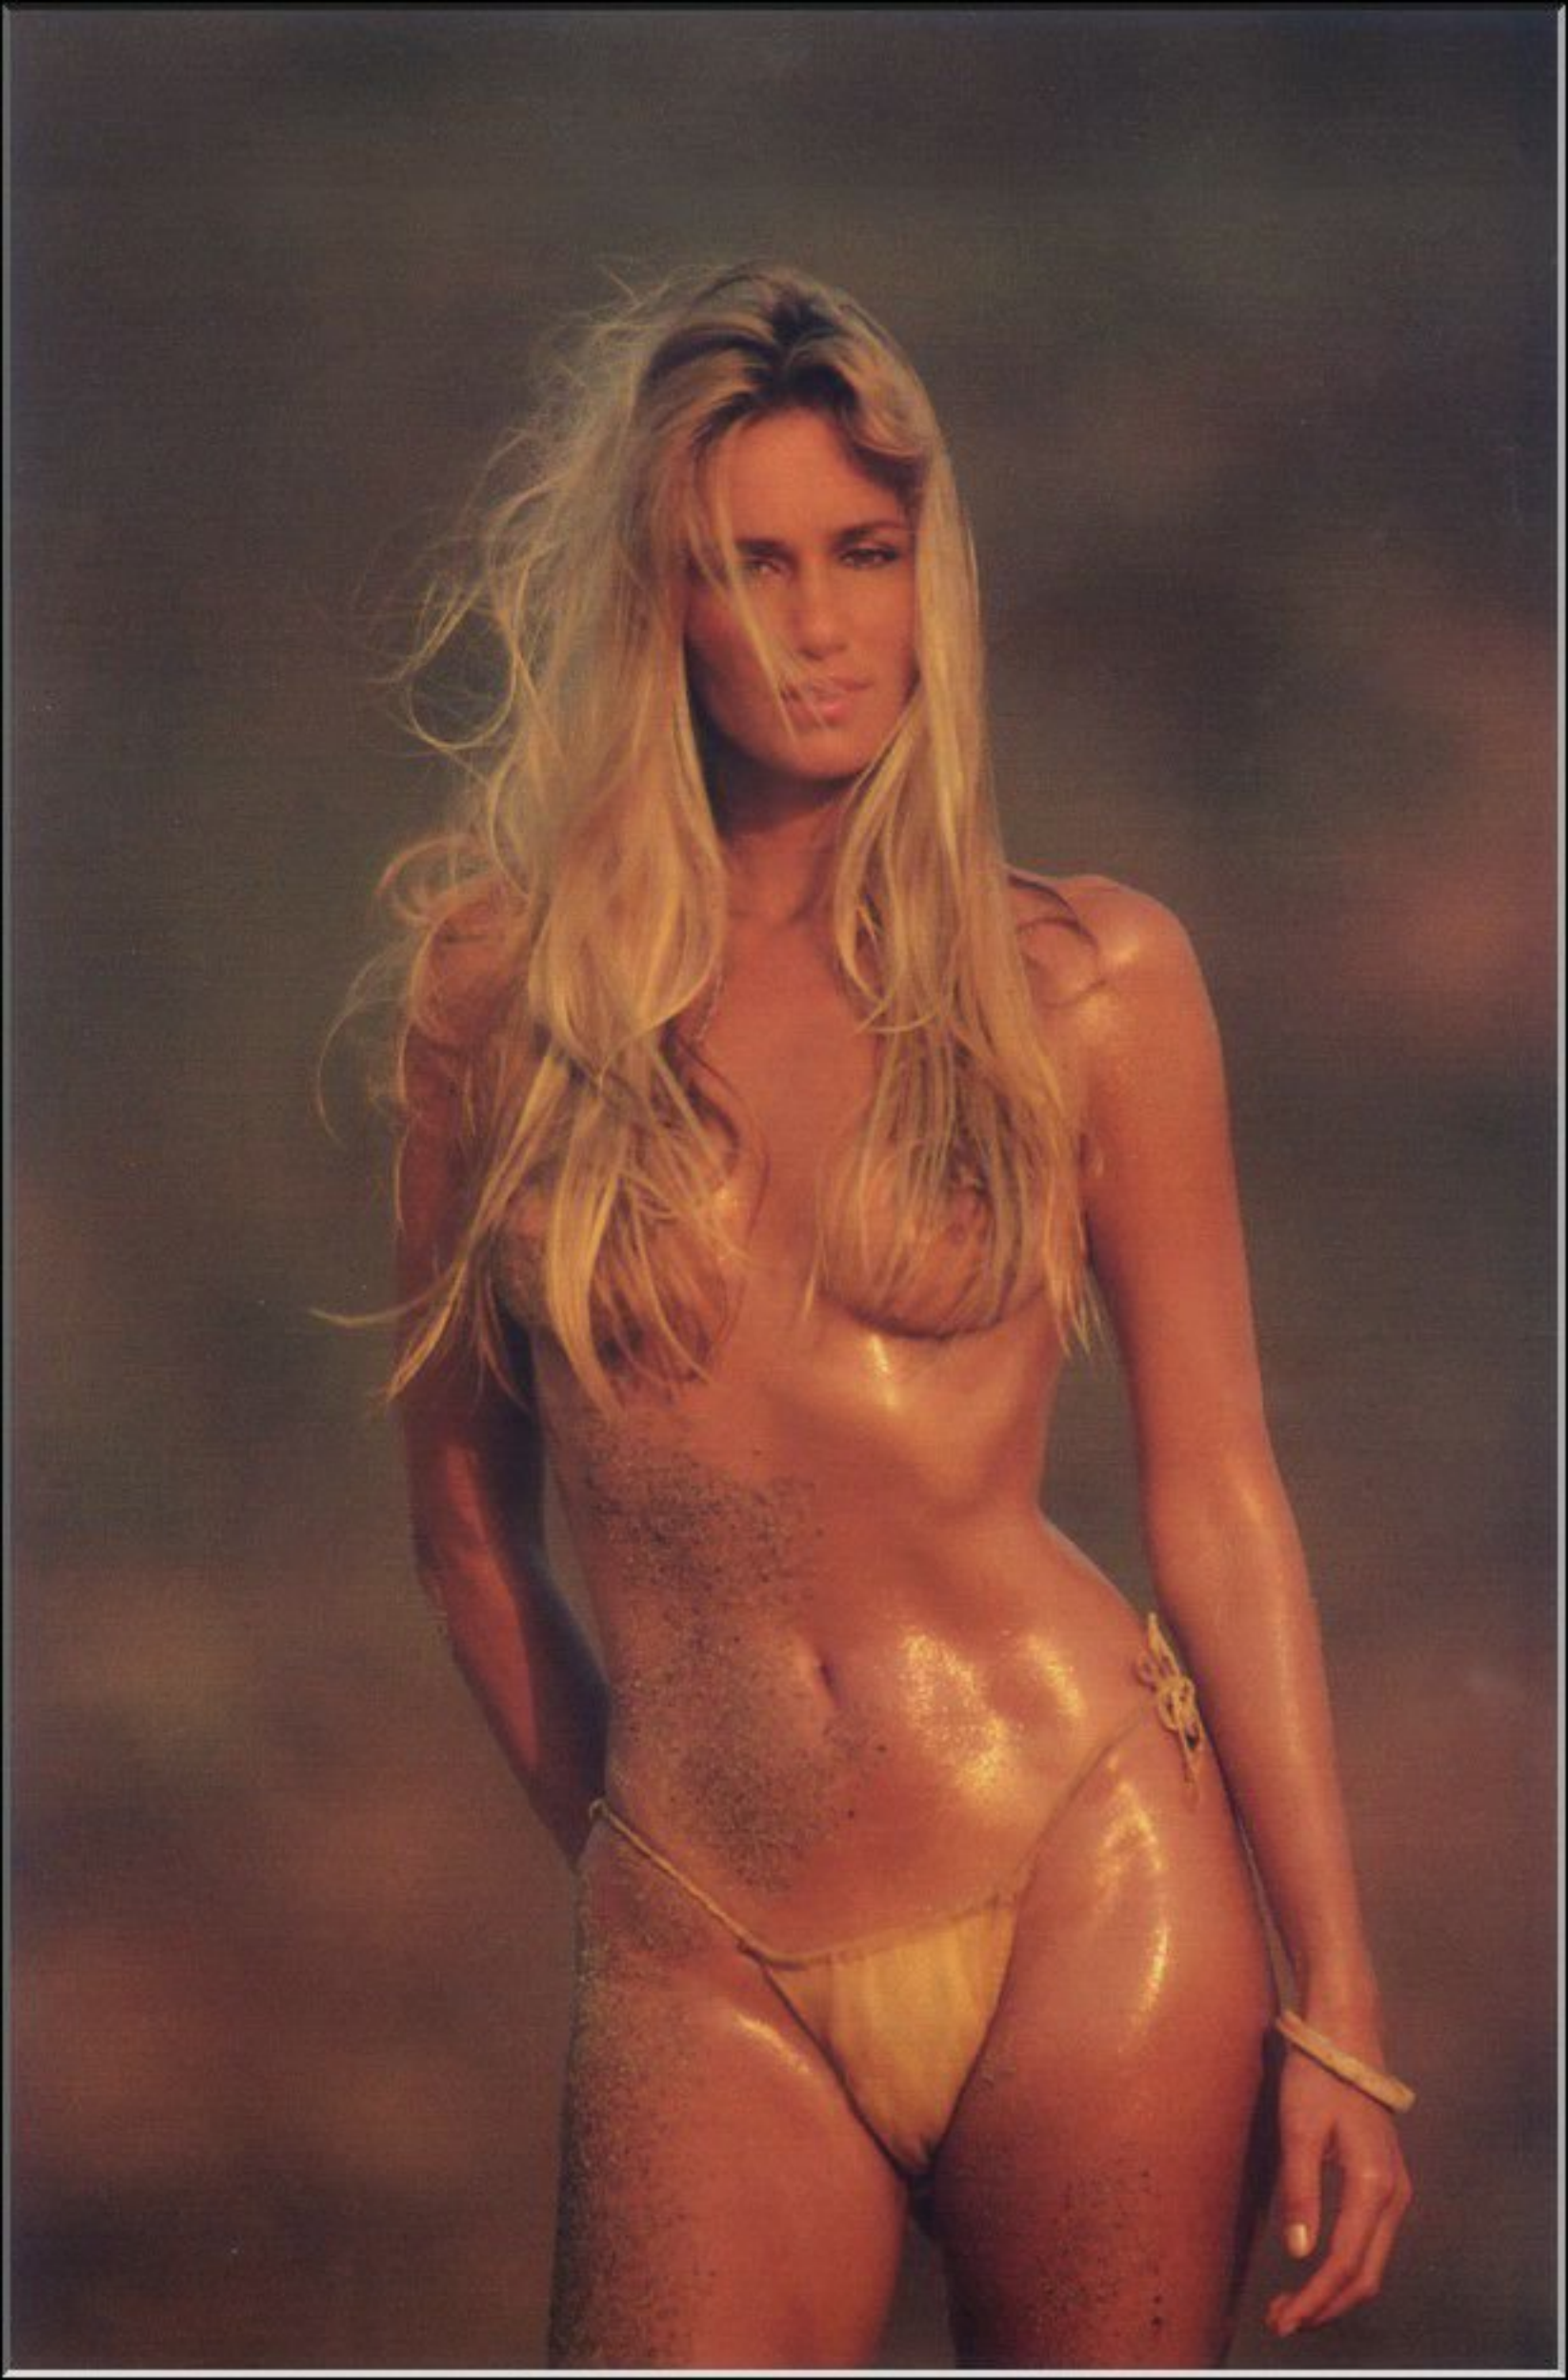

Proper research might direct serious girl watchers to a seaside chair, a good place from which to keep an eye on activities. As the day progresses, a plenitude of monokinied sun worshipers take their places in the sun. Christina Herbert (center) is joined by Shirley Mason (right) and, finally, Shannon DeShay (overleaf). We've left a chair empty so that you can put yourself in the picture.

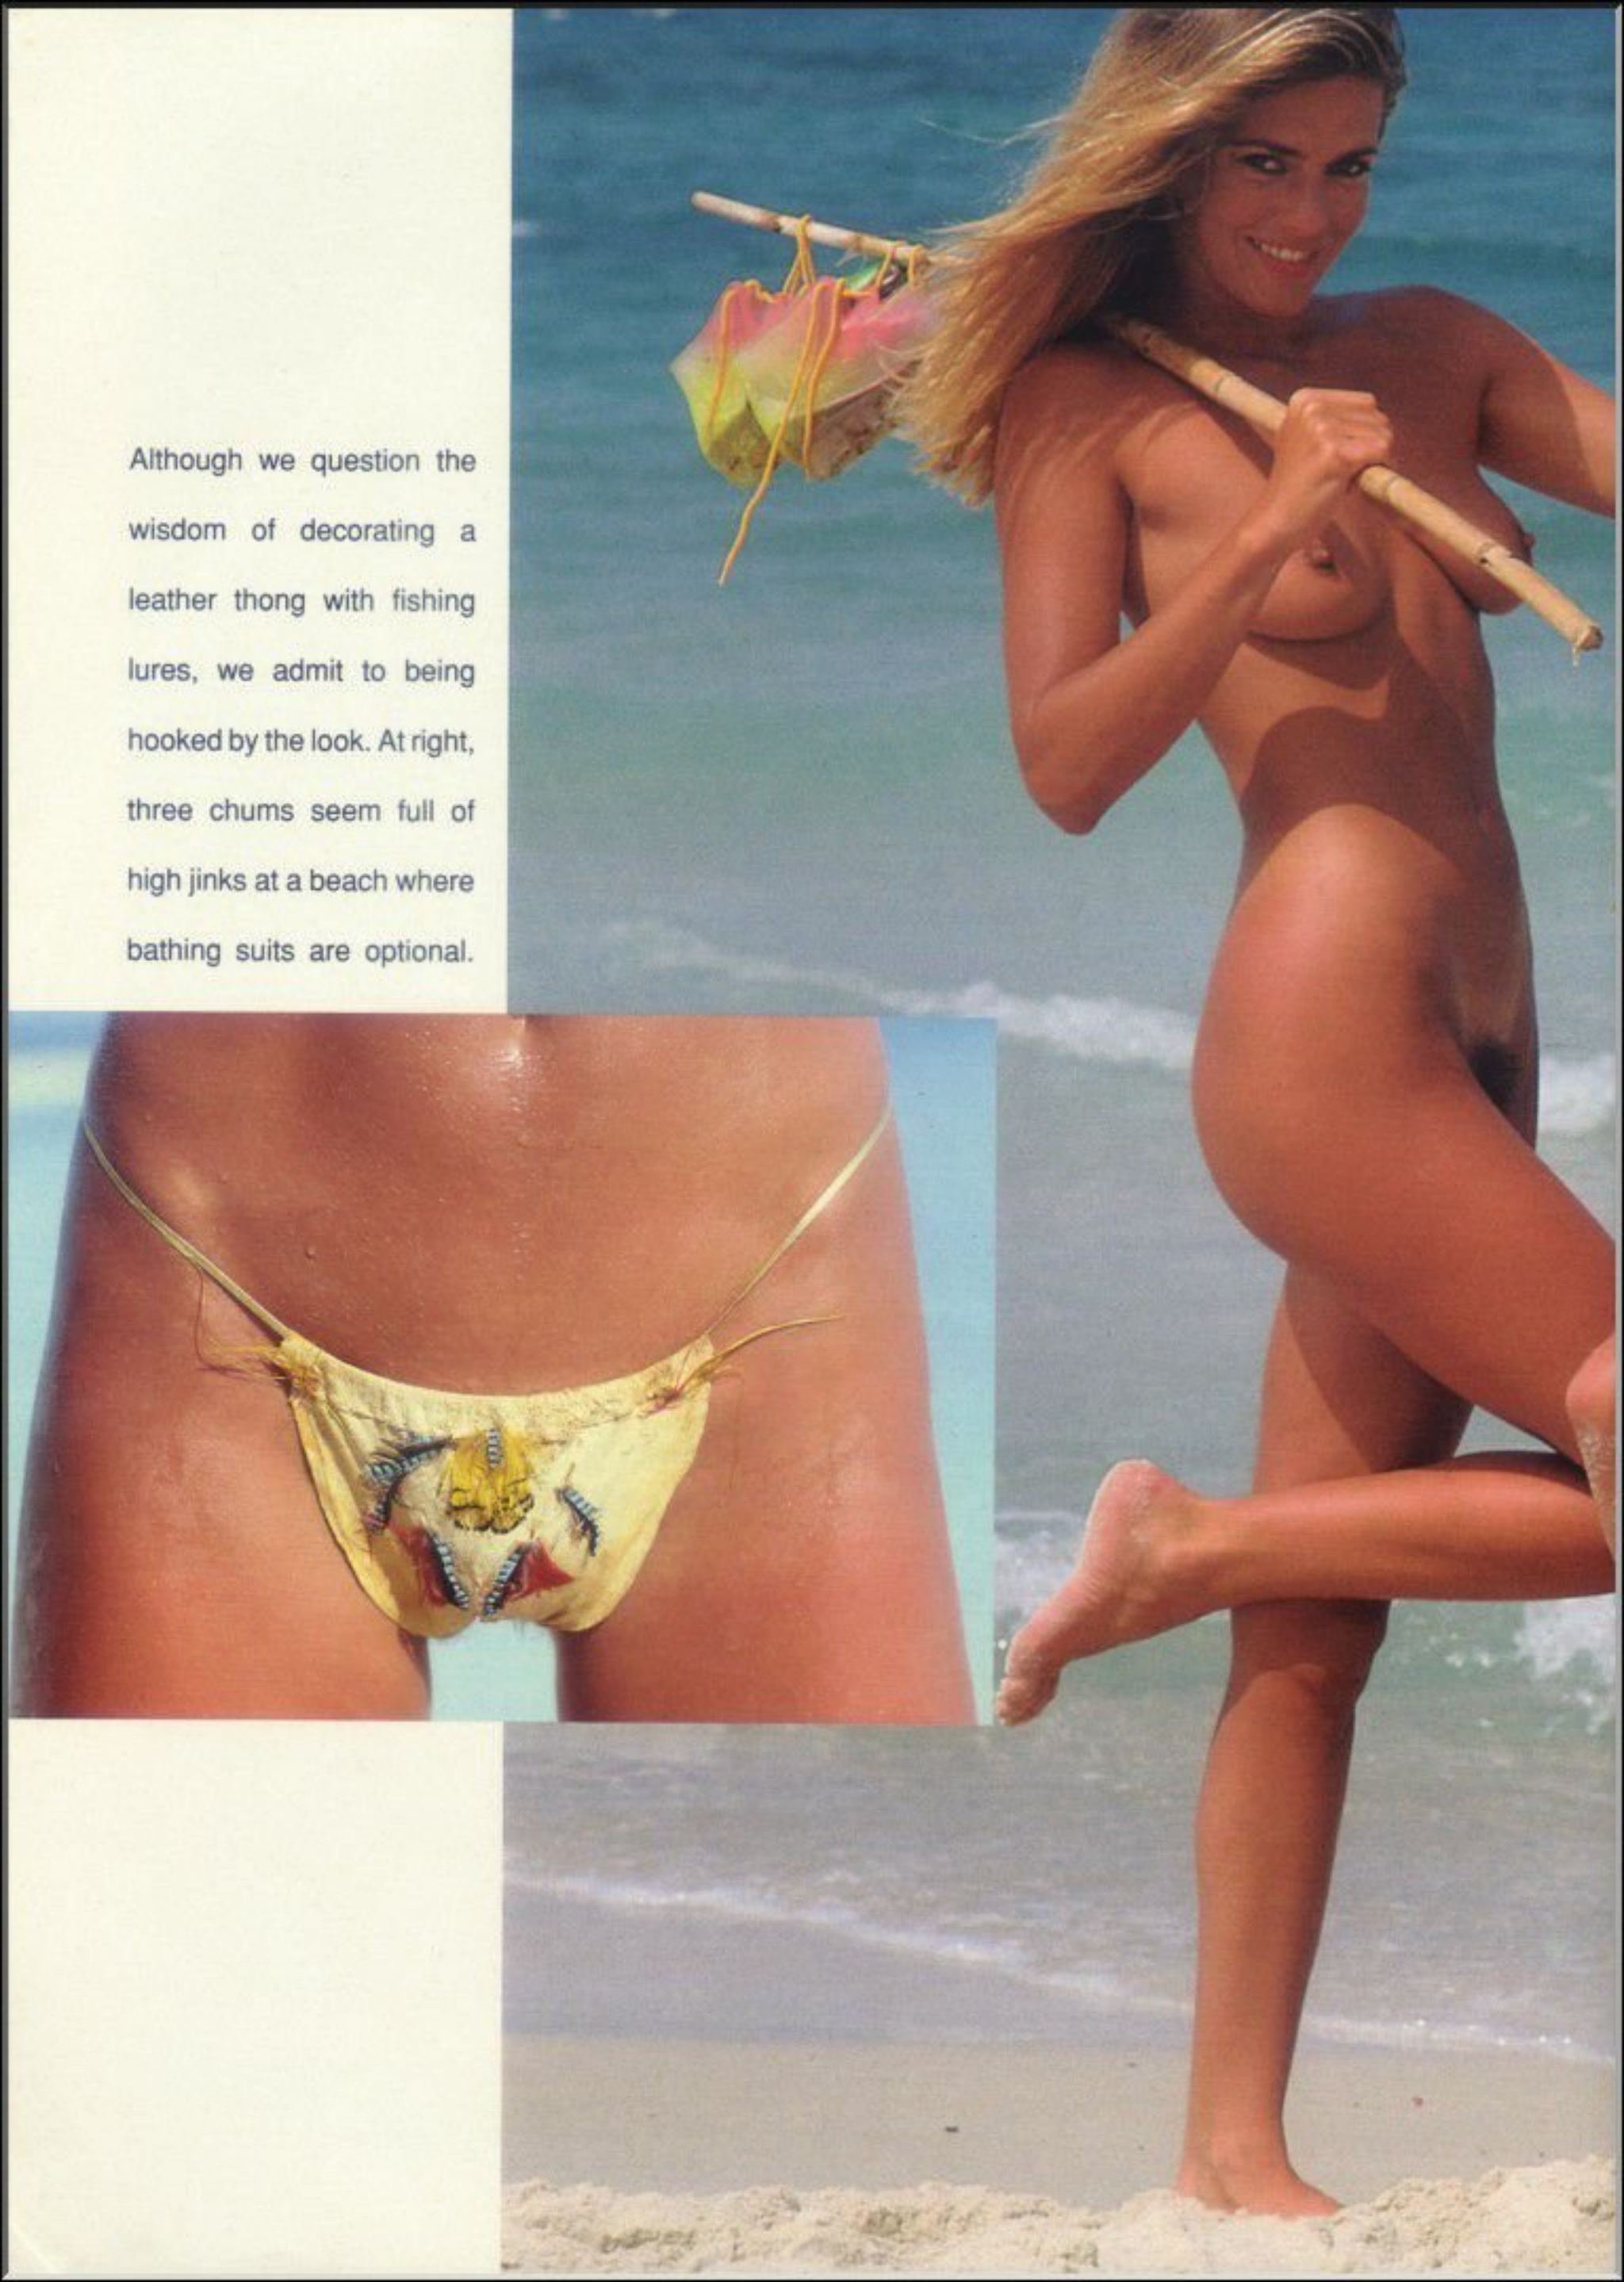

Although we question the wisdom of decorating a leather thong with fishing lures, we admit to being hooked by the look. At right, three chums seem full of high jinks at a beach where bathing suits are optional.

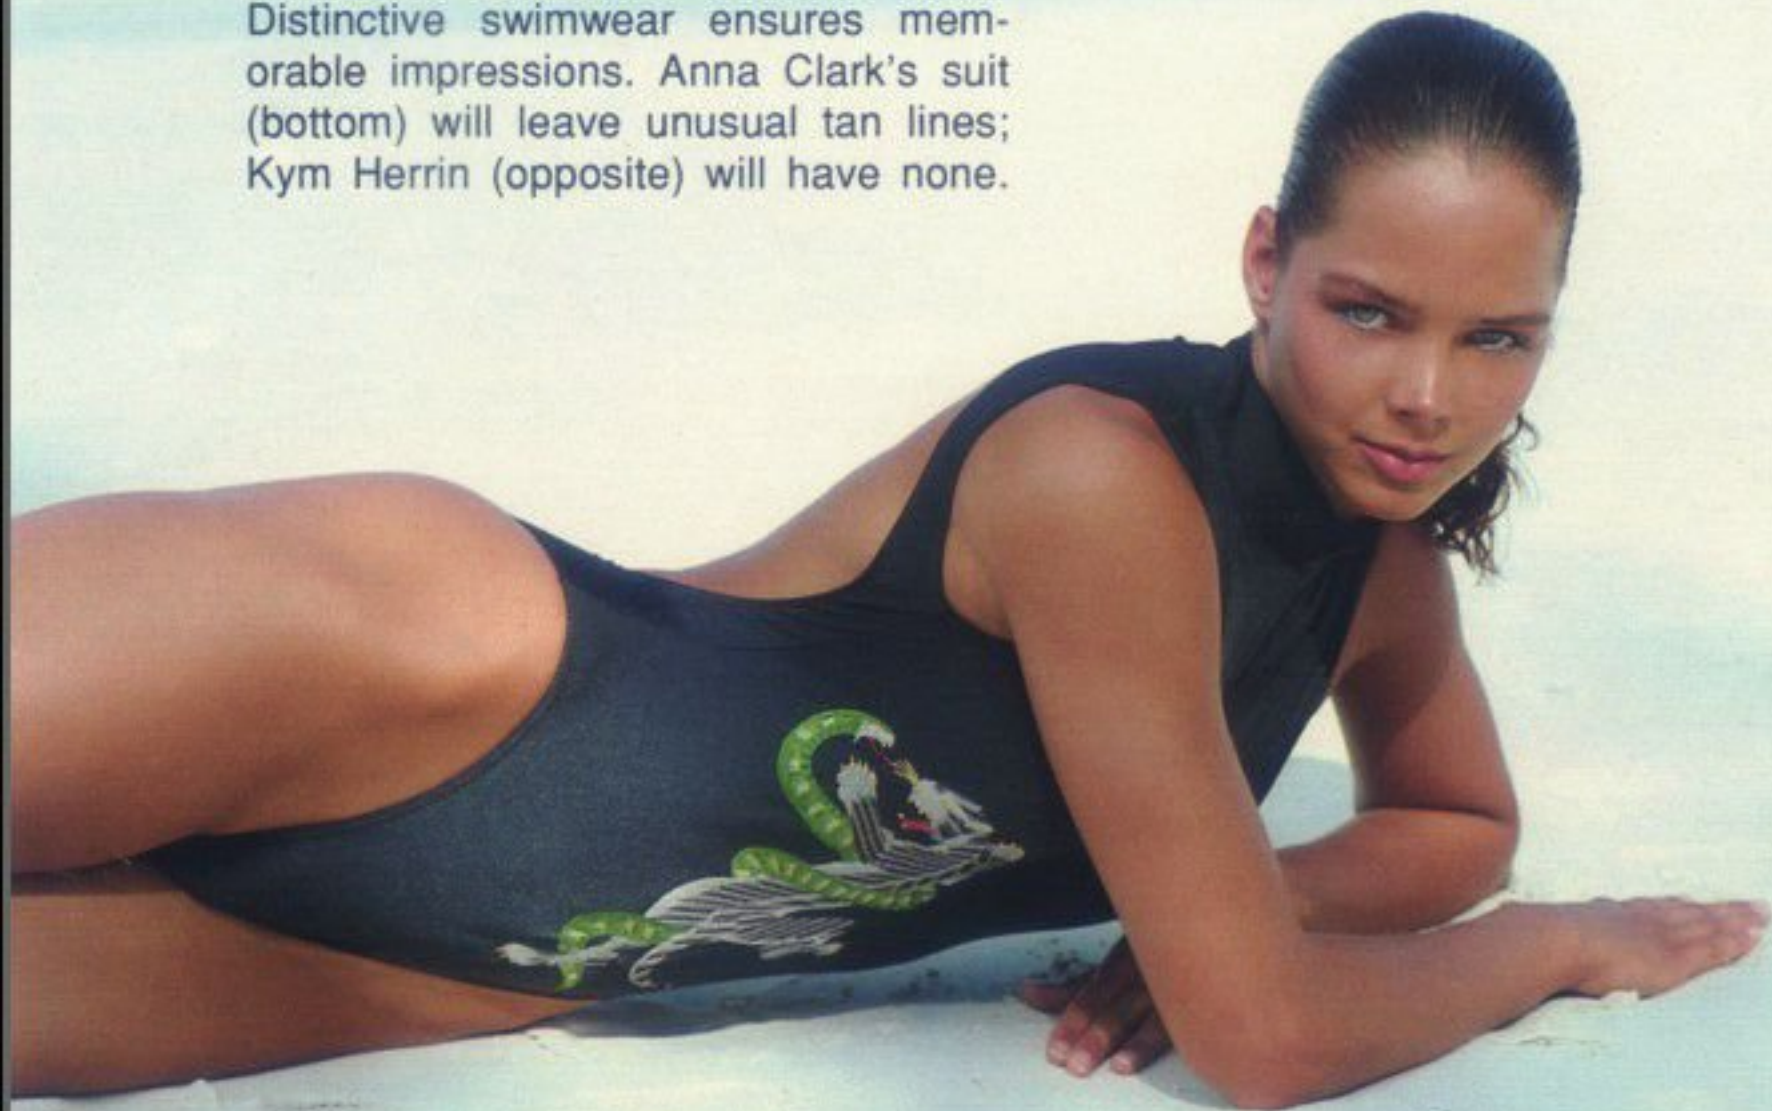

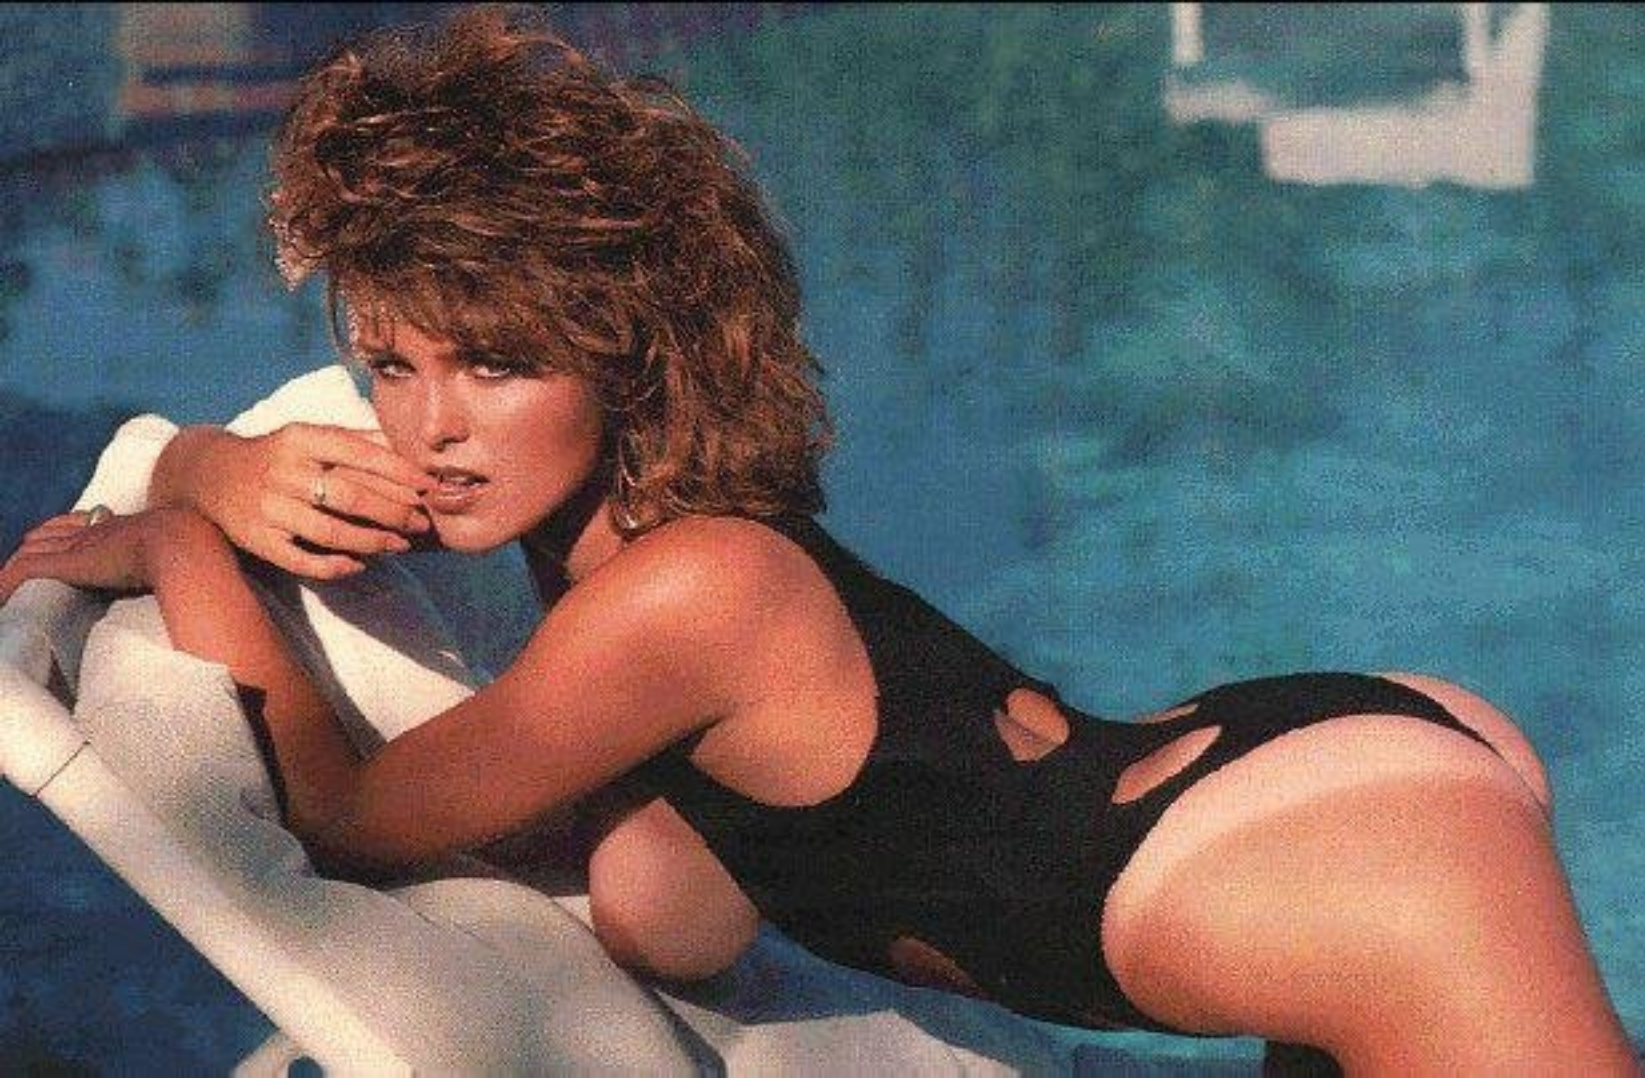

Distinctive swimwear ensures memorable impressions. Anna Clark's suit (bottom) will leave unusual tan lines; Kym Herrin (opposite) will have none.

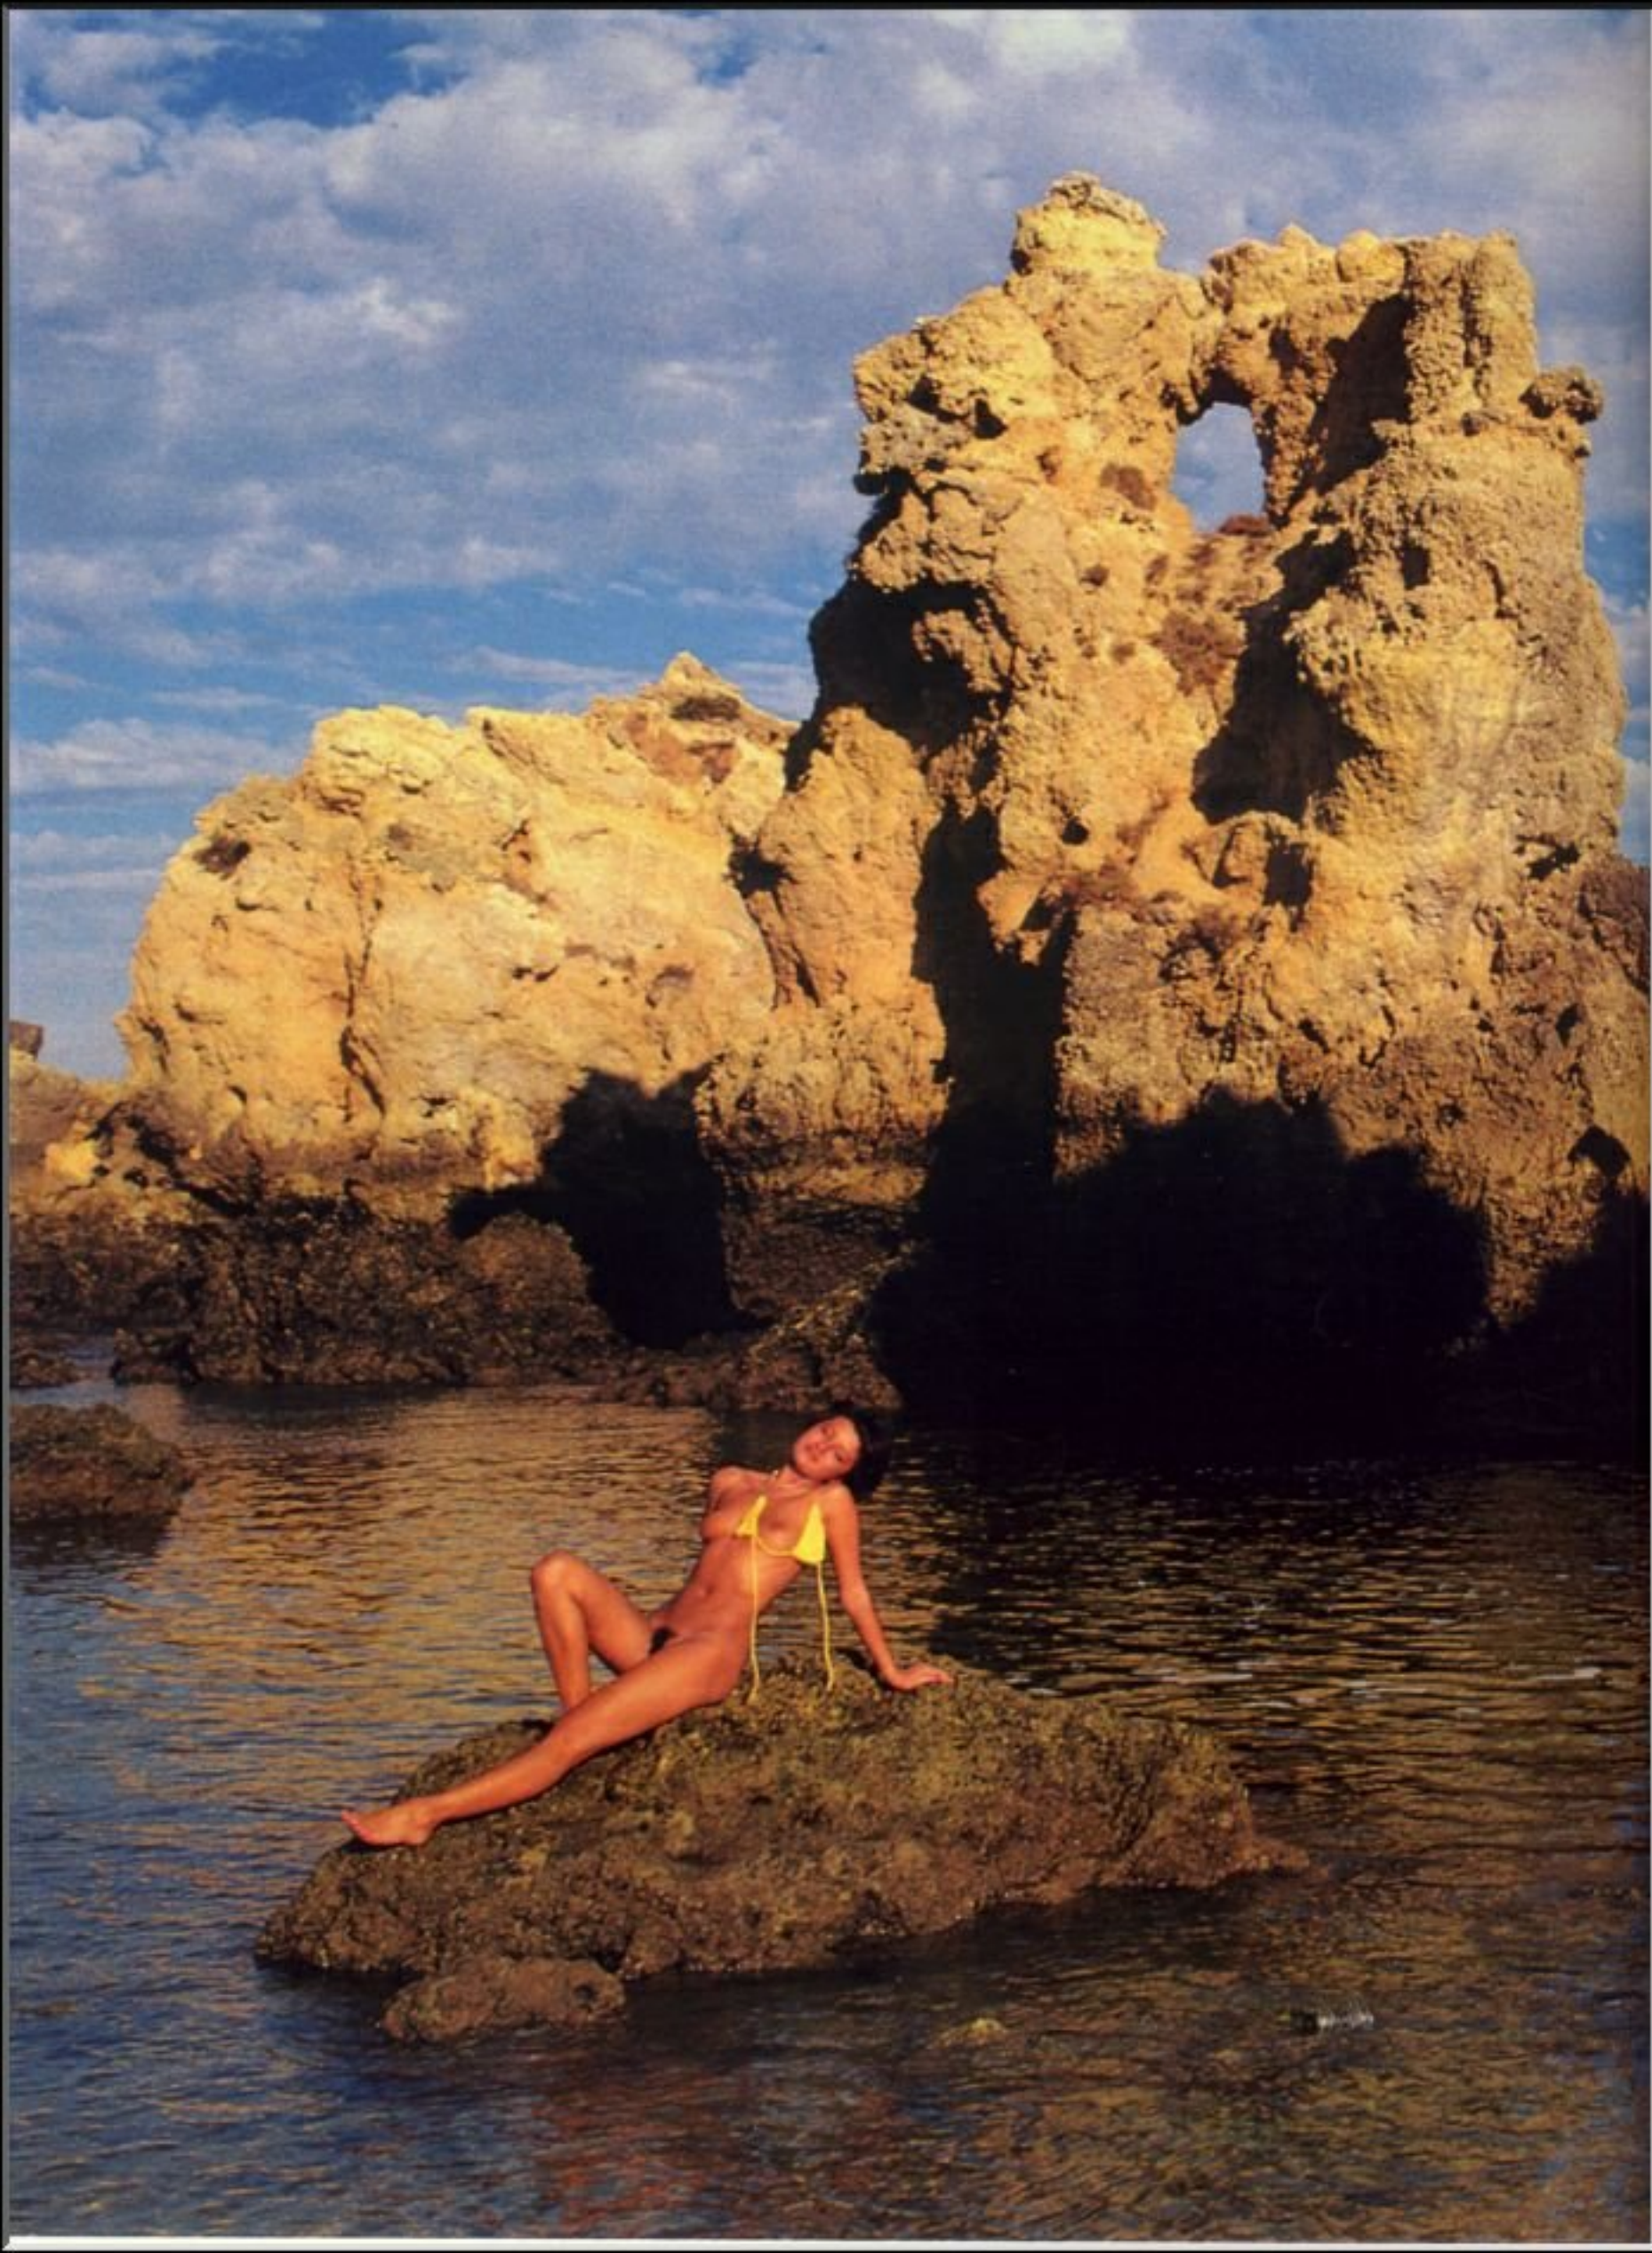

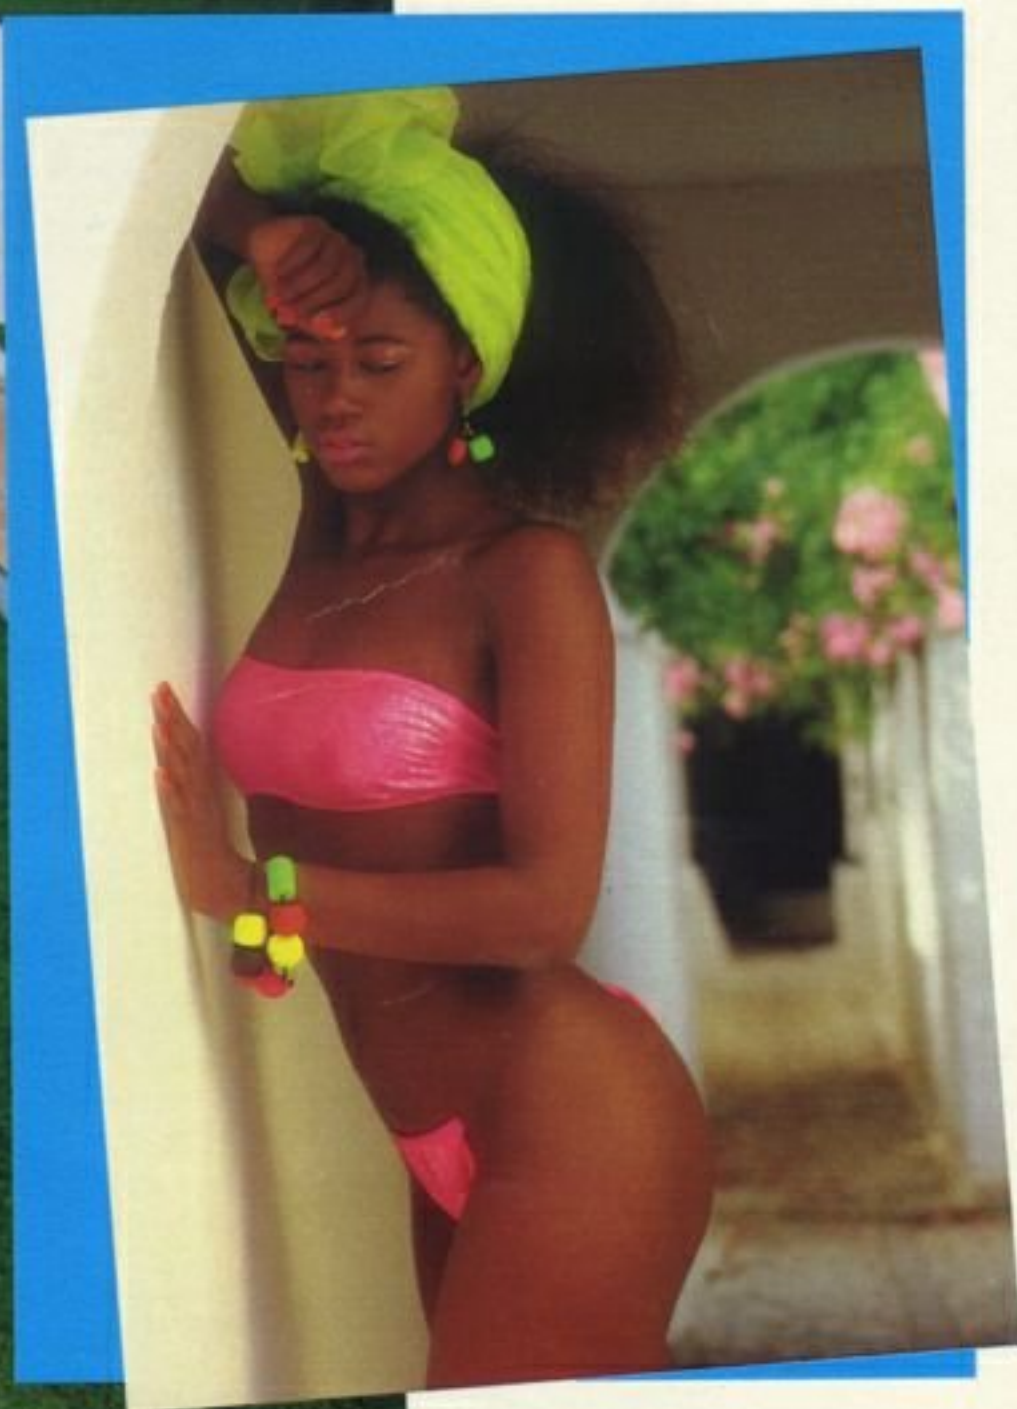

Called Minikinis, these costumes originated in St.-Tropez, mecca for the rich and famous, watering place for sophisticates from all over the globe. They are popular with women intent upon maximizing tans and much appreciated by men.

Could In Search of the Castaways have foretold the fate of Sophie and Frederique? They washed up on the shores of a veritable paradise when the wind died and left girls and sailboat high and dry, marooned with only a personal stereo for entertainment. Being rescued does not seem to be of immediate concern.
